

Proponent Testimony

Senate Bill 1

June 15, 2021

Chairwoman Lehner, Vice-Chair Brenner, Ranking Member Fedor, all members of the Senate Education Committee, I would like to express my utmost gratitude for having the opportunity to testify in front of you today regarding Ohio Senate Bill 1.

My name is Nate Grant, I am a resident of Reading, Ohio, a graduate of Reading High School as well as a current freshman at The Ohio State University. During my high school years, I was fortunate enough to attend a high school where personal finance is valued enough to be required for graduation. The vast gains in financial literacy that my classmates and I experienced has brought me here today to advocate for an exceptional opportunity that all Ohio students deserve.

In the process of considering Senate Bill 1, I am certain you will hear multiple testimonies detailing the statistical effects of this bill's passage or the fiscal feasibility of such a role-out, but what I hope to do is remove probabilities and potentialities and share with you the true human impact. As Valedictorian of my class and coming from a home well versed in financial ability, I was amazed upon entering my Personal Finance class to the extent of knowledge of which I was still unaware. I was surprised to find myself nowhere near prepared for life as a financially independent adult. Fortunately, my rude awakening to financial reality came in a controlled environment where I was encouraged to learn and adapt. Of all the math, English, foreign language, science classes, and 56 college credit hours I completed as a high school student, perhaps the most practical and necessary was one section of Personal Finance. I know I do not stand alone in feeling the great impact of this course.

Two years ago, classmates Anna Sofio and Carly Laknuhar made the case for financial literacy requirements in their Senior Capstone project, which was highlighted in the documentary The Most Important Class You Never Had. Anna is now in her second year at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School and Carly is serving in the military. Last winter, several more classmates and I joined Mr. Brian Page to share with Senator Wilson and others the importance of a financial literacy class. For myself, I expressed how the class put financial skills into a practical sense that was not only applicable to everyday life, but also long-term goals. The other three are here today, and will share their passionate support. We are just a handful of thousands of students, who according to a survey of thousands completed by the NFEC, believe personal finance is the most important class they could take in high school.

I have seen first hand the great impacts financial education has on students, and it is no small thing to lift the veil of fear and misunderstanding that surrounds many financial institutions. The majority of Ohio's students have no adults in their life that can accurately explain the benefits of building credit, buying insurance or investing early.

Senate Bill 1 has the opportunity to empower each student to control their own financial destiny instead of letting it control them. For this reason and with respect to the benefits it would have on generations to come, I sincerely hope you give this bill strong consideration. Again, I thank you for allowing me to share my experiences and speak in support of Senate Bill 1.
